Drama at its finest.

This is our second year of "Dolls in the Halls". Our staff hide various dolls around the school, students who locate the doll get a prize from the staff member who hid it. The students love this activity, as well as the staff. Finding unique places to hide has been fun.

Each soul is different. But each soul is similar at the same time. In my project I found that all people are similar, but that all people are different at the same time. Each design is beautiful, unique, special, and yet, there are some parts of us that yearn and strive to be like the other. Red symbolizes the struggle to be different, anger at not being the same, the color black chosen as the void of darkness in which people find themselves time and time again. No one in this world is perfect, we all make mistakes, and you must choose to accept it, or you will find yourselves in the black void, your uniqueness the only thing that is saving you from disappearing into the darkness. Of course you may leave, but only after you see that you are beautiful just the way you are and you must accept your differences from everybody else. While I was working on this project I found that everybody has their mistakes and imperfections, but it makes them beautiful, and the drawings of each of my classmates show the imperfections, but it also shows how beautiful these imperfections can be.

For my blind contour piece I did a bunch of witches with an ombre, shattered-glass background. I named my piece Witches of The West. The thing that inspired my work was the Halloween spirit. I love this time of season because there are so many cool decorations and costumes. Once I found out we were doing this project I was overjoyed! I decided to do a shattered glass look because when I think of Halloween I think of old abandoned houses and shattered or broken windows. I thought the whole concept of broken glass being in the background was super cool so I tried it out. The thing that went most well for me was the actual drawings themselves. I love how all my drawings and blind contours came together. The thing that I would say was the hardest part was applying all the little pieces from magazines and all with the modge-podge. Overall I think that this project was super fun! I think you can really just see the story that the artwork is telling, or even someone making up their own story for it.
